No doubt the fairest and most elegant method of catching salmon, in low, clear water, is with the trout fly, feed in rivers. No food, as a rule, is found in their stomaches, but they de-cidedly feed Even if they rush at files from curiosity it cannot explain their taking worms. Moreover, a fish has been seen to rise in a tranquil loch, at a large, yellow butterfly, and on the Tweed a salmon was observed to swallow a bee baited on a hook.

On the Dee, a salmon may be noticed taking March browns, as trout do, and they are caught, both there and on the Tweed, with rather large, artificial March browns. This settles the question as to their feeding in fresh water. But with a high, steady glass, with cloudless skies and low, silver streams, it is a weary thing to wait for their capricious appetites, and many a fisher is flying from rivers that are becoming as
